Acquisition expands OP screening company's reach

Overland Park, KS: Examinetics, an occupational health company, will expand its foot-print with the acquisition of North Carolina-based Occupational Testing Group.

The deal, which closed in December, will allow Examinetics to reach additional U.S. markets for mobile occupational health screenings. It also will allow the company to provide more services, such as medical examinations for worker exposure to cotton dust, which is often present in facilities where cotton is handled and processed.

"The acquisition of OTG complements our overall occupational health screening and data management service offerings," Examinetics CEO Troy Heppner said in a statement. "With this acquisition, Examinetics has further enhanced our screening capabilities and provided additional mobile capacity to meet the growing demands of our customers."

Examinetics provides mobile occupational health screenings, data services and well-ness programs to help companies meet occupational health regulations. The company provided 850,000 screenings in 2017.
